Emergence of the “Cartel Party,” in which “colluding parties become agents of the state and employ the resources of the state (the party state) to ensure their own collective survival”

The mass party as a single cross-sectional element of party type development throughout modern politics, rather than an end stage which parties will inevitably evolve into (eventually with either stability or overall decay)

Cartel parties largely act as this third option: parties become somewhat consubstantial with the state, and must make connections to civil society which they do not necessarily organically have
