Core question: "However, not all legislators are equally interested in working with others to provide public goods. Put another way, not all legislators are equally interested in distinguishing themselves from others as providers of local public goods and private goods that target a particular constituency. What explains this variation?" (Crisp et al., 2004, p. 824)

"Local public good" – ties to some specific portion of the population.

Seems to be very heavily tied to pork barrel spending as well (Ferejohn 1989)

Very closely tied to Carey & Shugart 1995 – personal vs. party reputation

Look at tie to Fortunato et al 2021 – difficulty of attributing specific legislator behaviors. Also a concern of Carey 2009 – observation of votes is particularly important

"H1: Personalizing effects captured by candidate selection procedures and ballot type encourage legislators to distinguish themselves from other incumbents and initiate local pork or particularistic service bills that can be targeted at their personal reelection constituencies." (Crisp et al., 2004, p. 831)

Broader point: it is possible to introduce incentives for personalized campaigns and subsequent legislation. Plays into the party strength literature, and especially open vs. closed list (see Carey 1995)

Continues Carey's discussion of "district magnitude" as an important interacting consideration of electoral systems

Aligned with Jones & Hwang 2005 – when parties have significant control over legislators' futures, very limited provision of pork and/or
